POETRY

TRICKSTER'S SON

After reading E. B. Murray's "Jerusalem Reversed" in Blake Studies vol. 7 no. 1, I opened my copy of Blake—conscious of imitating Blake's use of Bysshe—and began reading "The Voice of the Ancient Bard" as "in a mirror, darkly." The result is not the finest poetry, but note the energy of Blake's words is not destroyed and in some cases is enhanced with new meaning: "Her perplex roots tangled / there!" This is not meant as an example of extending Murray's criticism or of promoting a Cabellistic dabbling in Blake's good book—just one poet's playful response to England's greatest.

Videmus nunc per speculum in aenigmate...
Paul, I Corinthians 13:12

Hither comes delight of youth, morn opening to see. And born new truth of Image.

Reason of clouds!
And fled is doubt teasing artful, and dispute's dark maze. Endless is folly's way. Her perplex roots tangled there! Fallen have many how dead, the bones over night.

All stumble. They care but what not know they feel. And be led, should they? When others lead. Wish.

MR BLAKE'S SPECTACLES
At the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge

Through Mr Blake's spectacles the ranked Swedenborgian angels ruffle their wings, as if in an aviary.

Flamingoes shower over Lambeth, and the horses that draw the constellations may be seen sparkling, for the tiles of the roof are translucent.

intersecting vortices • cannonade over a strewn sea.
On the orlop deck the suture moans for its lost friend.

Yet the bridges of London are held up by tawny young giants the colour of Bath stone, and the sky balloons like a tent over Primrose Hill.

The poet's work is done; follow him home into a room contoured like an engraving where Mr Blake's spectacles are oriel windows looking over • the architectonics of Jerusalem.

TWO POEMS

SONG OF INNOCENCE

Deep into September the rose-hips are little spots of hares' blood.
In the perpetual cardgame between the rowan and the bramble the ace of spades has come up in the shape of a rook with folded wings.

Deep in there in the wet grass he was born, in 1757, was born directly from the wet grass.
They threw him in the river.
He rode on the waves.
They threw him in the fire.
He rose from it with eyes of fire.

He is William Blake with a blue hat and pink cheeks.
Alive, he wandered on the grass of death.
Dead, he wanders in a humming cloud of bees over Hampstead Heath.

AN EVENING AT HOME WITH WILLIAM BLAKE

Even as a child he drew people the way they look, as houses with long legs beginning under the chin. They grew out of the ground like grandfather clocks from the floor like tables and chairs from the parquet. Houses are built from within, built from below, by hands reaching up from the soil. They grow out of dark basements.

And this house around you is hell, and this house around you is the law, is the power over you. In there they buy you and sell you.
The lines in his brow know that the time of the Tiger must come before the time of the Lamb, that there are words other than those that fill the mines with children and the colonies with soldiers in red coats. The engraver’s burin cuts lines in the metal. The contours of the world are etched in the acid bath, his veins in the boards of the walls.

Walls around us. Walls within us. Shut in we speak to a wall
within ourselves.

2.

William Blake’s wife lifts the clothes-iron from the stove, carries it to the table. Heavily it slides over the damp shirt over warm white cloth. His thoughts are so heavy. They have stuck in the clothes that are so full of thoughts that they will never be really clean again.

She comes to him lies down beside him on the bed.
Their shoes meet under the bed in front of the china pot with the green garland of flowers. His sex presses in between her thighs among soft curly hairs, presses into the moist cleft where the Universe is created, slippery wet walls becoming tense and then lax. The Universe pulsates with their movements from star to star from darkness to darkness.

Freedom comes flowing in through their nostrils, opens doors and shutters, draws the wind through the chimney kindling the fire. A gust of wind goes through the houses, shakes them so that the pans fall down from their racks.

Only their heavy breathing separates them from the darkness until it too begins to breathe violently dies and is born again, is filled with light growing up around them. Another house where the sky comes flowing blue through the windows where the clouds glide through the rooms, the floor greens and is covered with flowers when his semen falls on it.

Quivers and creaking from the bed, soft liquid running between their thighs. For a second it was they who made the Universe grow, who made men rise and continue their journey, roots of trees press deeper into the earth for water.

3.
The same grey-headed God his muscular body covered with silvery down.
The same white Goddess made pregnant by a flow of stars.
The same rain between the furrows. The oxdriver’s cry forces the plough through the soil with the power of brown muscles.
The same sun chained among the boughs of the trees.
The same face nailed to the trunk of a tree. The same blood on the wet clay making everything move forward making the new Albion rise from the sea of Time.

4.

With the shutters wide open their house is filled with light.
Their brains are burning like overheated lamps, burning the air in the room, lighting up the whole city. Giant cats come out of the alleys showing the tattered men the way home.

It is the beginning of the time of the Tiger.
The cries of the masses flow in through the windows.

When the walls are falling within you the walls of the Bastille will fall. When the walls fall within us we become a single living force that rifle bullets cannot harm not a river but a sea like time, not a river but a sea.

Tomorrow or a thousand years from now we will open the roof hatch and arise our faces turned toward the sun, arise from our houses as from murky wooden coffins. Tomorrow or a thousand years from now we will live the lives we were meant to live. William Blake blows out the candle. Tomorrow we will color the pictures, he says.

THE LAST JUDGEMENT

Sometimes fishermen haul in their nets, or an ox tongue curls to lick a word from its eye, or from the earth a diaphanous rain
