W. J. LINTON'S TAILPIECES IN GILCHRIST'S LIFE OF WILLIAM BLAKE

Robert F. Gleckner

In his Bibliography of William Blake Sir Geoffrey Keynes made an attempt to identify all of Blake's designs from which W. J. Linton made his wood engravings for the 1863 edition of Alexander Gilchrist's Life of William Blake, "Pictor Ignotus": in Volume I four full-page cuts (three from the Job series and "Plague") and fifty-six smaller cuts in the text; in Volume II seven small wood engravings in the text. Logically assuming from the Gilchrist titlepage statement, "Illustrated from Blake's own works, in facsimile by W. J. Linton," that all of these cuts (other than those "in photolithography" and the "few" Blake "original plates") were based on, or engraved after, Blake originals, Keynes nevertheless lists ten in Volume I and three in Volume II as unidentified (he ignored the one on page 111 of Volume II)--all rather miniscule chapter tailpieces. In Blake Books (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1977) G. E. Bentley, Jr. makes no comment about Linton's contributions to the Life, and Robert Essick in his "Finding List of Reproductions of Blake's Art," Blake Newsletter, 5 (1971), 1-160, lists only Linton's full-page cuts--properly so given the purpose of the list.

In my recent research toward an article on Linton and Blake (forthcoming in the Bulletin of Research in the Humanities) I re-examined all of Linton's contributions to Gilchrist's Life and have managed to identify all but three of the tailpieces unidentified by Keynes. They form an interesting pattern, one that reflects certain problems Linton had with Dante Gabriel Rossetti over the inclusion in the Gilchrist of photolithographed reproductions of the Job designs. Of the thirteen tailpieces (fourteen including the one on page 111 of Volume II) the sources of which Keynes could not identify, nine are from the border design of Plate 12 of the Job series (see Illus. 3):

1. Volume I, page 11: the sixth figure from the top right of Job 12, reversed.
5. Volume I, page 233: fifth figure from top right, reversed, again with Linton's spiky stars (see Illus. 2).

Elsewhere in Gilchrist we have Linton's wood engravings of Job Plates 5, 8, and 14 (all full-page, the last excluding Blake's border designs except for the corner angels), the top half of the border design of Plate 18, and the circular part of the main boxed design of Plate 15. From Rossetti's correspondence with Anne Gilchrist (who had taken over the editing of the Life at the death of her husband) as the volumes were nearing completion, we learn that, despite their plans to include photolithographs of the entire Job series, Linton (who had been a part of the project as early as 1861 and, one would presume, knew about the photolithography idea) went ahead and executed his own wood engravings of the entire series.

It is not clear what led to this confusion, for in February 1863 Linton had written to Rossetti "about the illustrations" and Rossetti had even taken the trouble of visiting Linton to consult with
For his eyes are upon the ways of Man & he observeth
all his goings

I am Young & ye are very Old wherefore I was afraid Lo all these things worketh God oftentimes with Man to bring back his Soul from the pit to be enlightened with the light of the living

If thou sinnest what doest thou against him, or if thou be righteous what givest thou unto him him about them. At about the same time Rossetti received from Mrs. Gilchrist the Job photolithographs which he said pleased him "much—being, though blurry, very full of colour, and not losing perhaps by reduction but getting concentrated in a pleasant way." Taken together, these letters suggest that the plan to photolithograph the Jobs was one of long-standing. The only problem with Linton involved a design he engraved for the titlepage, the original of which Rossetti apparently had not seen, for upon receiving it (or, more likely, a proof of it) from Mrs. Gilchrist he returned it to her for some "amendment," saying he would venture "to write a word to Mr. Linton suggesting the removal of the cut, which surely is no facsimile from anything of Blake's, but a sort of design by some one else."

Then, as if doubting his authority, he added a postscript to this letter: "Would you perhaps send the Titlepage on to Mr. Linton—to explain better what I mean." But Rossetti, perhaps reinforced by Mrs. Gilchrist in a letter not extant, did nevertheless "advise" Linton to omit "that insane cut in the title page." With all this to-do there is no evidence in the letters of Rossetti or Mrs. Gilchrist to suggest any misunderstanding about the Job series. When Linton sent Rossetti the (apparently) final list of illustrations to the volumes, then, and included in it all his copies of the Jobs, Rossetti was in a quandary about what to do with them since the photolithographs were ready to go. He quickly wrote Mrs. Gilchrist: "I see he still includes the Job Plates which he copied, in spite of the photolithographs which might be considered to supersede them." What finally emerged is clearly a kind of compromise, Linton no doubt insisting that at least some of his Jobs be included even along with the full photolithographed set, Rossetti urging Mrs. Gilchrist (in the letter just quoted) that "it seemed a pity to leave them out after the trouble and expense." Why all the rest of Linton's Jobs that were included, piecemeal, as tailpieces turn out to be one, Plate 12, I cannot say. Perhaps that plate was, simply, one of his favorites; perhaps, even more simply, it was the only other one that he actually engraved.

Of the other five tailpieces Keynes could not identify, I can be certain of only one, that on page 269 of Volume I, which is the lower-left figure on the titlepage of Visions of the Daughters of Albion. That on page 160 of Volume I (see illus. 4) may be a version (reversed) of the reclining figure in the center of Plate 4 of Europe, or possibly of the second figure from the bottom right of Job 12, or even more likely to my eye, the figure to the left of the word "Albion" on the titlepage of Visions of the Daughters of Albion—though I have no great confidence in these sources since all of the other tailpieces are exact replicas. For those on pages 304 and 367 of Volume I, and 24 of Volume II (see illus. 5, 6, 7), I cannot find even good analogues. Perhaps these last were taken from the excised titlepage design; or they are examples of Linton's idea of a Blakean figure or design; or they are taken from other of Linton's own voluminous work (the one on II, 24, for example, is strongly reminiscent of details in several of Linton's wood engravings for Harriet Martineau's A Description of the English Lakes, 1858). In any case, Linton's entire role in the Gilchrist project, as well as his own fascinating Blake-like career, deserve considerably more scholarly and critical attention than they have been accorded to date.
DISCUSSION

WITH INTELLECTUAL SPEARS & LONG WINGED ARROWS OF THOUGHT

THE DEAD ARDOURS REVISITED

David Bindman

Before "The Dead Ardours Perry" enters the canon of Blake's writings [see David V. Erdman, "Leonora, Laodamia, and the Dead Ardours," Blake 54, Fall 1980, pp. 96-98] and becomes part of the intellectual heritage of the English-speaking peoples it might be of interest for me to describe what I can make of the words on the drawing with it in front of me. To begin with, the letters 'WB' on the left are below the level of the disputed text, therefore David Erdman's assumption that they belong with it is doubtful: more to the point, perhaps, is that the letters 'WB' do not look as if they are in Blake's hand, and they are not in the same type of script as the other text. There can be no doubt about the initials words 'The dead' nor, I believe, that they are in Blake's own formal script, but it is still not even clear how many words follow. I agree with Erdman that 'bad-doers' does not work but I would dispute it because there appear to be four letters where he reads the 'ard' of 'ardours'; in fact I see a faint 'b' or another letter with a long vertical stroke before his conjected 'ard'. That final 'd' is certain, the 'ar' at least possible, in which case we are left with 'bard', which makes sense but can only be regarded as a tentative suggestion. The four letters read by Erdman as 'ours' may complete the word as he suggests (in which case it would be unlikely to begin with 'bard'); there could be a hyphen between them and the previous word (as in 'bad-doers'), or they could form a separate word. What makes it especially difficult is that they seem to have been gone over and altered in pencil, most likely by Blake himself. As for the word read by Erdman as 'Perry' it looks very much to me and to others who have looked at it as if it begins with an elaborate '1' and it could end with a 'g' and not a 'y'. I can make nothing of the letters in between. I should also say that it seems very improbable that Blake would have brought in the name of such an obscure engraver in this way, in the same formal script as the title, even if there were other evidence to connect it with the Leonora engravings.

I am sorry to have thrown the question open again, but anyone who wants to have another try is always welcome to look at the drawing in London. David V. Erdman's response will appear in the summer 1981 issue. Eds.
