Nancy Willard, A Visit to William Blake’s Inn: Poems for Innocent and Experienced Travelers

Elizabeth B. Bentley

Blake/An Illustrated Quarterly, Volume 17, Issue 1, Summer 1983, pp. 35-37
"Creeping on hands and knees through matted thorn [and fern-leaves] / To find her nest." The "Hind," the "Woodbine," "Cynthia," "Minstrel's" and the "wanton Heifer" are very unusual in Blake's verse, and Blake knew that the singing nightingale was masculine ("his song" appears in Milton), not feminine as in "To the Nightingale" ("lovely Chauntress"). The evidence for Blake's authorship of "To the Nightingale" leads hesitantly to possibility rather than to certainty. He could have written it, but until we have more evidence it will be safest to assume no more than the possibility—numbers of others could have written it as well. And there are numerous contemporary poems which might equally well be his, some in periodicals even signed W. B. "To the Nightingale" does not deserve to be included in the Blake canon (p. [viii]), except perhaps as a footnote.

This Watch of Nightingales is, then, a charming nonce collection revealing much about the nature of the genius of English poets, but leaving the magical nature of the bird's song and the authorship of "To the Nightingale" still mysteriously obscure. As Keats wrote in his "Ode to a Nightingale," "Darkling I listen "in embalmed darkness."

Readers and scholars of William Blake are likely to be much attracted by the title and notion of A Visit To William Blake's Inn: Poems for Innocent and Experienced Travelers, by Nancy Willard and illustrated by Alice and Martin Provensen. Nancy Willard relates her experience as a seven-year-old convalescent measles patient introduced to William Blake through the good offices of an imaginative sitter who first quoted four lines of "The Tyger" and then sent an illustrated book containing William Blake's Songs of Innocence and of Experience.

Having published her first book while a high school senior, Nancy Willard has gone on to publish some fourteen books, a number of them children's books for which she has twice received the Lewis Carroll Shelf Award. According to the dust jacket summary of A Visit To William Blake's Inn, she teaches in the Vassar English Department. Her scholarly publications include a study of four twentieth-century poets, William Carlos Williams, Francis Ponge, Rainer Maria Rilke, and Pablo Neruda, entitled testimony of the invisible man (Columbia, Missouri: University of Missouri Press, 1970). In the introduction to this study, a Vassar colleague writes admiringly of Nancy Willard's poetry. A Visit to William Blake's Inn, then, is written by an experienced and successful author of children's stories, a university teacher of English, a critic and a practicing poet who connects this book with her youthful introduction to William Blake's Songs of Innocence and of Experience.

The inside of the dust jacket of A Visit To William Blake's Inn assures us that the illustrations reflect the multiple-award-winning artists' "deep love for William Blake and the London in which he lived." The paper and color printing of the book are of very good quality. The first illustration to the first poem (pp. 14–15) shows a red-haired man on the steps of a house labelled

Reviewed by Elizabeth B. Bentley
“WILLIAM BLAKE ENGRAVER POET & PAINTER” and “WILLIAM BLAKE BED AND BREAKFAST.” This is quite a happy beginning except that William is disconcertingly dressed as a high-Victorian businessman, in a frocked coat, a double-breasted waistcoat and morning trousers. The Provensens are presenting a later period, often bluntly not William Blake’s London.

However, William Blake does remain red-haired and often is to be seen writing or drawing. On page 21 there are a man, woman and boy engaged by candlelight in mysterious engraving or process with a press which is not for printing. On pages 29, 35 and 41 the red-haired man sits at a desk or drawing board with a quill pen and blank sheet before him. Since there is no evidence of an ink pot to hand, the paper seems doomed to remain blank.

A tiger is one of the guests at William Blake’s Inn. The illustrations on pages 12, 32 and 37 are vaguely reminiscent of the Tyger of Blake’s Songs of Experience. Perhaps one should leave it at that. However, on pages 21, 35 and 41 the Provensens have produced an overgrown pussy cat which is neither Blakean nor tigerish.

Twice the verses call for a vehicle to be illustrated, and the Provensens have responded with “Blake’s Celestial Limousine” (p. 16) and the vessel Believe (p. 31) which is a wheeled boat captained by Blake. Both these vehicles enjoy the whimsy of a Frederick Rowland Emett creation and sent me off to enjoy the collections of his Punch cartoons. Every child or adult who has seen my copy of A Visit to William Blake’s Inn commented favorably on the charm of the illustrations. So, in sum, the illustrations do give pleasure, though that dust jacket blurb still worries me. The illustrations, however pleasing and closely following the text they illustrate, do not reveal very obviously “a deep love for William Blake and the London in which he lived.”

However, they lead one to Nancy Willard’s poems which do have charm and imagination and a final, appropriately-cited, Blakean message from The Marriage of Heaven and Hell which one hopes readers of all ages will take to heart: “He whose face gives no light will never become a star.” The title and subtitle of the book lead one to expect a close connection with Songs of Innocence and Songs of Experience, but Nancy Willard’s “Poems for Innocent and Experienced Travelers” are peopled with dragons, rabbits, a shaggy old bear, a lunatic cat, a King of cats, a wise cow, rats, and pigeons which are disconcertingly unBlakean to me. However, one is pleased to encounter the tiger and lambs which are appropriately Blakean.

The Willard poems amiably call to mind a number of writers other than Blake. “Blake’s Wonderful Car Delivers Us Wonderfully Well” with a driver whose cap is labeled “Blake’s Celestial Limousine” (p. 17) reminds one of E. M. Forster’s “The Celestial Omnibus.”2 “Blake Leads a Walk on the Milky Way” (pp. 32-33) is like Rudyard Kipling’s “The Cat Who Walks by Himself,” and when “The Man in the Marmalade Hat Arrives” (p. 22) in the middle of March, one definitely feels as if one were in the wrong fantasy and about to encounter Alice at any moment. (Indeed, there are two little girls who make their first appearance in the illustrations in this poem.) The Marmalade Man reappears in “The Marmalade Man Makes a Dance to Mend Us” (p. 36), which runs:

Tiger, Sunflowers, King of Cats,
Cow and Rabbit, mend your ways,
The needle, you the thread —
follow me through mist and maze:
Fox and hound go paw in paw.
Cat and rat be best of friends.
Lamb and tiger walk together.
Dancing starts where fighting ends.

This seems to me an excellent marching song for innocent and experienced travelers.

There are at least two of Nancy Willard’s poems which are clearly modeled on William Blake’s Songs. In “The Tiger Asks Blake for a Bedtime Story” (p. 40), the reader familiar with Blake will think of “The Tyger” and “A Poison Tree”:

William, William, writing late
by the chill and sooty grate,
what immortal story can
make your tiger roar again?

When I was sent to fetch your meat
I confess that I did eat

Tyger, Tyger, burning bright,
in the forests of the night:
What immortal hand or eye
Could frame thy fearful symmetry?

I was angry with my friend:
I told my wrath, my wrath did end.
half the roast and all the bread
He will never know, I said.

When I was sent to fetch your drink,
I confess that I did think you would never miss the three kumps of sugar by your tea.

Soon I saw my health decline
and I knew the fault was mine.
Only William Blake can tell tales to make a tiger well.

Now I lay me down to sleep
with bear and rabbit, bird and sheep.
If I should dream before I wake,
may I dream of William Blake.

I was angry with my foe:
I told it not, my wrath did grow.
And it wasred it in fears,
Night & morning with my tears:
And I summed it with smiles,
And with soft deceitful wiles.

And it grew both day and night
Till it bore an apple bright.
And my foe beheld it shine,
And he knew that it was mine.

And into my garden stole,
When the night had veild the pole:
In the morning glad I see
My foe outstretched beneath the tree.

Also, “Two Sunflowers Move Into the Yellow Room”
(p. 28) is clearly modeled on Blake’s “Ah! Sunflower.”

“Ah, William, we’re weary of weather,”
Said the Sunflowers shining with dew.
“Out traveling habits have tired us.
Can you give us a room with a view?”

They arranged themselves at the window and counted the steps of the sun,
and they both took root in the carpet
Where the topaz tortoises run.

Ah Sun-flower! weary of time,
Who countest the steps of the Sun:
Seeking after that sweet golden time
Where the travellers journey is done;

Where the Youth pined away with desire,
And the pale Virgin shrouded in snow:
Arise from their graves and aspire
Where my Sun-flower wishes to go.

The sitter’s gift of Blake’s Songs to a very young Nancy obviously took root in her imagination and poetry.

The result of this implantation is a children’s book of much charm in verse and illustration. It also bids us to make comparisons with the Songs of Innocence and of Experience, and I hope future sitters and friends of ailing and healthy responsive young children will be as wise as Nancy Willard’s Miss Pratt and produce William Blake’s verses for them. A Visit to William Blake’s Inn well illustrates the value of an early introduction to the Songs.
Scholars and admirers of Blake should be very grateful to Nancy Willard for her admirable demonstration that Blake’s Songs should be brought out of the study and put into the libraries of the young.

1 The scene is somewhat reminiscent of Fermin Rocker’s illustrations to The Gates of Paradise, a children’s novel based on the poet William Blake. See “A Vision in Fiction,” Blake, 12 (Winter

2 Edward Morgan Forster, “The Celestial Omnibus” and Other Stories (London: Sidgwick and Jackson, 1911). There is also the anomaly of William Blake having a limousine. In the Supplement to the OED, the earliest known usage of “limousine” is recorded from 1902. Both the poems and the illustrations seem to me quite happily to depict this time rather than a full century earlier.