Veils, Infinity, a Roof, and “One thought” in Contemporary Art: A Note on Four Exhibitions

Detlef W. Dörrbecker

Blake/An Illustrated Quarterly, Volume 30, Issue 3, Winter 1996/7, pp. 82-87 that wakes Albion, at which point

England who is Britannia enterd Albions bosom rejoicing, Rejoicing in his indignation! adoring his wrathful rebuke.
She who adores not your frowns will only loathe your smiles

(95:22-24, E 255)

This, alas, is the apotheosis of Blakean woman. Britannia is subsumed by the male: her entry into "Albion's bosom rejoicing," as depicted on plates 96 and 99, implies an incorporation into the male body. Britannia does not reappear in the poem.

The depiction of a postapocalyptic world in the remainder of Jerusalem bears out the earlier pronouncement that in Eden/Eternity "all are Men." The poet hears the "Vision of Albion" speak; the Vision of Albion is, as Blake's faculty of "Vision" has always been since the songs of Innocence, an irreducibly masculine ability to organize perception. The Vision of Albion is identified with "The Universal Father" (97:6, E 256): patriarchy is not wiped out; rather, authority has been apportioned "universally" among the male members of a brotherhood; it is the final stage in Lerner's developmental model of patriarchal history.

There is, however, a hint of the persistence of the female at the poem's conclusion:

All Human Forms identified even Tree Metal Earth & Stone. all
Human Forms identified, living going forth & returning weared
Into the Planetary lives of Years Months Days & Hours reposing
And then Awaking into his Bosom in the Life of Immortality.

And I Heard the Name of their Emanations they are named Jerusalem

(99:1-5, E 258-59)

It seems fitting that, in the very last line of the epic that the poet intended to be his greatest statement, Blake's proliferating myth should come to rest upon its central contradiction, a contradiction that remains unresolved: a system that wishes to unify and equalize all persons is founded upon the principle of the dominance of a masculine subject over an emanated and secondary female object.

Veils, Infinity, a Roof, and "One thought" in Contemporary Art

A Note on Four Exhibitions

BY D. W. DORRBECKER

At the brink of the new millennium, Blake still hasn't found that large readership in the German-speaking countries which Henry Crabb Robinson had expected to grow so rapidly when drafting the essay he contributed to the Vaterländisches Museum in 1811. Therefore, it comes as a surprise to find that over the past few years Blake's works have inspired a series of exhibitions by contemporary artists in Austria, Germany, and Switzerland which may warrant a brief report.

Supposedly, only few of the visitors who came to see Verena Immenhauser's installation "Beneath the Veil of Vala" at the Berner Galerie in 1988 were fully aware of the Swiss artist's understanding of the symbol of Vala's veil/valé and its complex meaning in the poetry and art of William Blake. And yet, anybody ready to engage with the aesthetic experience offered by that installation must have felt the urge to question the relationship between the veil and the veiled, center and circumference, form and formlessness, the cycle of natural growth and decay (reigning in Vala's vale) and the ideas of stability and of eternity (governing a realm that lies beyond it). Employing soft transparent wrapping foils, Immenhauser created an environment inside the small gallery space which at first sight seemed devoid both of calculated form and all specific content. However, the movements of the visitors quite literally breathed life into the room which was filled with draped "veils" (illus. 1) hanging from the ceiling and hiding the measured dimensions of the walls. The softly whispering and ever-changing folds of the thin and shining plastic veils remained entirely abstract in shape, but functioned as an appropriate representation of Vala's veil of nature. Their rippling-rustling texture lured the sense of touch and the ear, while their utter refusal of all representational concreteness, the complete lack of linear (and optical) solidity, and their shimmering, silvery reflections, irritated and fascinated the eye.

In a sense, this finely tuned metaphor of Vala's art of seduction seemed related to Marcel Duchamp's famous "spider-web" installation for the Surrealist exhibition at 451 Madison Avenue in 1942. But it also anticipated such "physical sculptures" as the "Bodycheck" contributed by Flatz to the documenta IX in 1992, or the labyrinth of measured time made from hundreds of clocks, hanging folding rules, and "lost" digits that was shown by Cildo Meireles on the same occasion in Kassel. The magic and attractiveness which Blake and most of his (male?) readers fear in Vala was reflected by the artistic sorcery with which Immenhauser handled the insubstantiality of the translucent yet blinding and suffocating quality of her simple materials.

For his "1992 Infinite Painting on A Vision of the Last Judgment by William Blake 1808," shown in Berlin at the Zwinger Galerie, Nikolaus Utermöhlen mounted enlarged photocopies of Blake's "Vision" on thirteen aluminum panels (200 x 80 cm. each). The reproductions had been produced on a color photocopying machine which was manipulated by the artist so that a sequence of color variations resulted. Each panel (or, as Utermöhlen prefers to call them, each "spectre") displayed a different layering of the primary colors, blurring and distorting the clarity of Blake's original watercolor. Its design was thus supplanted with the cool glow of industrial colors which had been heightened by additional hand-tinted patterns and which produced the effect of a giant kaleidoscope. Utermöhlen's interest in the openness and mechanical "infinity" of possible color variations and in the configurations which can be assembled by grouping the aluminum panels on the gallery walls, produced a decorative color rhythm quite appropriate for a postmodern ice cream parlor. Sure enough, Utermöhlen's project may pass as yet another artistic experiment with the representational implications of technical reproduction and repetition. Moreover, the artist may well have hoped for a meaningful contrast between "classical form" and "modern technique" similar to the one achieved by, say, Jim Dine's appropriation of the Venus of Melos. However, I failed to trace any deeply felt conceptual relation between Utermöhlen's "Infinite Painting" and Blake's understanding of infinity or his idea of a Last Judgment. Rather, Blake's watercolor painting apparently had been chosen more or less at random, and the artist's references to a Blakean model served, in the end, as no more than a fairly banal attempt to dignify with iconographical content what was merely another more or less interesting experiment in replacing the old-fashioned brush with a xerox machine.

If Utermöhlen's central concern was that of a formalist, one will have to locate the works of Dieter Löchle at the other end of the spectrum. Under the title "Roof'd in from Eternity," his Blakean drawings, prints, and paintings were on show at the Tübingen university library in 1995. Almost devoid of color, Löchle's paintings relied on the simple opposition of darkness and light, created by black, white, and thinly saturated yellowish washes. These almost unstructured encaustic color fields provide the backdrop for the artist's similarly simplified linear adaptation of Blake's figural language. Drawing with the brush, with pen and ink, or with black and white chalks in what seems a consciously retrospective manner, Löchle reinvents the imagery of the illuminated books. Visitors to the exhibition were allowed to gauge this reference to Blake's relief-etched designs in the modernized versions by means of a generous selection from the Trianon Press facsimiles of the illuminated books which was on show in the library's vestibule. Löchle handles his lines with great clarity and achieves solid, almost "architectural" compositions that are all based on only one or two figures (as in many of Blake's own illuminated pages). For example, the German painter has translated figural motifs from Jerusalem 41, Milton 21, the frontispiece for Ahania, and plates 10 and 17 from Urizen into his own pictorial idiom (illus. 2-3).

Occasionally, when confronted with the symbolic portrait heads and some of the eroticized designs which were included in the show, I felt struck by what seems a curiously straightforward approach to the problems and functions of contemporary visual representation, an approach bordering on the naive. However, Löchle's linear abbreviations of the "human form divine" generally work well enough as a modern interpretative response to Blake. Because the expressive use of bodily movements in Blake's designs is perpetuated in Löchle's pictorial homage, his images seem highly charged with symbolic energy and meaning. And it is here that they provide an antithesis to Utermöhlen's dominantly formalist concerns. At the same time, the austerity and abstract quality of Löchle's draughtsmanship steer clear of the preoccupation with those "sublime," "fantastic," "weird," and more narrative aspects of the art of Blake and Fuseli which have previously attracted the attention of other Austrian and German artists such as Günter Brus, Alfred Hrdlicka, or Horst Janssen in some of their exhibitions of the 1970s and 1980s.

Löchle's stylistic choices lead towards a relative independence of his images from their Blakean blueprints. But they draw the viewer's attention to such characteristics as the white-line technique—first in Löchle's own prints, drawings, and paintings, but then, on the way out and through the show-cases lined up in the entrance hall, also in Blake's illuminated prints. In this sense, "Roof'd in from Eternity" was a group exhibition, ideally suited for an academic library. Löchle not only paid homage to Blake, he also invited the visitors to find out for themselves what he had seen in Blake's colored relief-etchings, and how he had seen it.

An entirely different and certainly non-didactic approach was chosen for a fourth exhibition which presented a far more radical, avantgardist, and in its own way very exciting use of the raw materials provided by Blake for the making of contemporary art. The first major one-man show in Germany for the Spanish sculptor and installation artist Jaume Plensa was organized by the Städtische Galerie Göppingen in the summer of 1995. Plensa's art often combines the visual and the verbal in a surprising, some may say an absurd manner. While this relationship of image and text cannot be described as "narrative" in any common sense of the word, it succeeds in making familiar objects seem strange, and it creates "new" and challenging combinations which provoke the senses and the imagination. His recent work exposes the spectator to environments assembled from prosaic objects of the artist's own everyday life and from inscribed panels, boxes, or cages which are cast in synthetic resin. Together with two other installations, the Göppingen exhibition introduced Plensa's (as yet unfinished) project on Blake's "Proverbs of Hell" from The Marriage of Heaven and Hell (illus. 4-5). Similar to Immenhauser's veils, but adding Blake's own words in blind-stamped letters on his polyester panels, Plensa's "Proverbs" provide a highly personal interpretation of Blake, the rich associations of which remain valid (or at least intellectually fascinating) even for an onlooker who is entirely unacquainted with the British poet-artist's works.

Most of the 1995 "Proverbs" consist of three elements, which are usually mounted at a right angle on the gallery's walls. The first of these elements is an object from the "hell" of the artist's studio work, such as a red plastic bucket which had been used in the preparation of the plaster Plensa employs in an early stage of his casting technique, or a cheap metal wastepaper basket which, one imagines, had once been filled with discarded sketches and studies for the artist's projects. The second element is a pillar, protruding about three feet from the wall into the exhibition space. Attached to the top of this pillar, sometimes standing, sometimes dangling headlong, is a small statue of a naked child. Both the pillar and the statuette are cast from semi-transparent polyester resin. The naked child is placed in a position which seems to defy the law of gravity and often suggests that it is contemplating the object from everyday life and the third element, a cast polyester panel with Blake's proverb inscribed in relief. By reading/viewing, for example, "The busy bee has no time for sorrow" in the panel mounted on top of one of the waste-baskets, the small figures on their pillars supply the visitors with directions for the use of the entire installation.

At the same time the transparent three-dimensional figures prompt us to muse about the relationship between the various elements that have been combined for each of the "Proverbs" and outward reality—to ponder on the practical usefulness of a red plastic bucket, a usefulness which is lost once it is made part of a work of art—to realize that thereby it may, however, achieve a different function, and may as such become useful in a different sense—to contemplate the representation of the human figure in its relation to the abstract stereometry of the pillar-cube it is attached to—and, of course, to think about the continuing relevance of what Blake's devils have to say concerning the nature, the social conditions and conditioning, and the role of the imagination in this world. One thing I didn’t like about the exhibition at Göppingen: its title, “One thought fills immensity.” In Plensa’s work, just as in many other instances of contemporary installation and concept art (and even in Blake), formal repetitions, the reduplication of a specific motif or shape are of essential importance. I doubt, however, that an irony was intended, and that the title was meant to draw the spectator’s attention to the filling of the “immensity” of the gallery space with just “One thought.” Even if it was, “The road of excess leads to the palace of wisdom,” and “Enough! or Too much” would have described Plensa’s secular modernization of Blake more appropriately.

Each of these four exhibitions tells us about specific modes and possibilities of the creative appropriation of Blake’s words and images. What Michelangelo was to Blake, Blake is to Löchle who—in the group of works discussed in the present note—literally/visually cites the elder artist’s figural language and/or entire compositional arrangements. Not only is the artist consciously transforming Blakean models, he also wants the viewer to recognize his citations as such. Just as an editor or a critic of Blake’s works might do, Löchle asks for the meaning which Blake’s art may have for an audience separated from its initial production by two centuries. The tension between the historicity of the pictorial inventions and the actuality of their rendering in Löchle’s “cover version,” between the identity of the motifs and the discrepancy of the formal qualities of their representation is exactly where the “meaning” of these paintings and prints from 1994-95 appears to be situated. Löchle’s insistence on visually confronting Blake’s images (by means of the facsimiles included in the exhibition) with his own works demonstrates a historical awareness which in turn allows for linking his art with certain techniques of scholarly interpretation.

If Löchle’s art is inspired by the “historical approach,” Immenhauser’s seems to provide a parallel with gender criticism. Those of the visitors to her installation who were alert to the Blakean connotations of Vala’s veil, will have glimpsed at a critical and revisionist view of the role assigned to Vala in the poem which was named after her, in Jerusalem, and in almost any learned commentary on these works. Immenhauser, it seems, “reads” Blake against the masculine grain, and by doing so she opens up an alternative understanding of Vala and her veil which attempts to visually “explain” some of the fascination which Blake himself apparently felt when creating the mythic character. To take this just one step further, one might classify Plensa’s sculptural montage of the “Proverbs” as an example of a “deconstructive” or a “hypermedia” art, the creation of an unstable artistic reality from seemingly unrelated textual elements, which in a continual flux combine and dissociate to form a variety of meaningful, yet “open” constellations.

5 Jaume Plensa, “Proverbs of Hell 3: The road of excess leads to the palace of wisdom,” wall piece made from synthetic resin and a brass object, 98 x 71 x 50 cm., 1995. Städtische Galerie, Göttingen, Germany; photo: Lluis Bover.

Now, does this mean that these contemporary artists work with scholarly methodologies in mind? Or that scholars unconsciously are creating their texts along the same lines that artists create their works? Though Immenhauser and Löchle have indeed written academic theses on Blake, such a conclusion would seem rather ludicrous to me. The construction of abstract analogies between art and scholarship as two “fruits” of the human mind still seems synonymous with comparing apples to peaches. However, to look at contemporary artists’ reactions to Blake’s words and images, and to draw such parallels, may still be a heuristically useful exercise, one that will remind the critic of the plurality of legitimate and potentially meaningful engagements with Blake’s works.
MINUTE PARTICULARS

Seeing Thel as Serpent

by Hilda Hollis

Thel's motto remains one of the most enigmatic aspects of William Blake's short Book of Thel. It is composed of a series of questions, the intent of which is unclear, and which only seem to provoke more questions:

Does the Eagle know what is in the pit?
Or wilt thou go ask the Mole:
Can Wisdom be put in a silver rod?
O Love in a golden bowl?

(i.1-4, E 3)

Most discussion focuses on the second pair of questions, and my argument begins with this set. Two major sources are widely suggested for these lines: Ecclesiastes and Milton's Comus. The former refers to the issue of mortality which is of paramount concern to Thel, and the latter bears a relation to Thel's virginal and frightened chastity. I suggest that, while contributing to our understanding of these lines, neither Ecclesiastes nor Comus comprehends the full or multiple meaning of Thel and its motto. Blake first composed these lines in Tiriel in a section which he subsequently deleted, and this original context suggests another metaphor which has implications for the whole of the later book.

When Tiriel first utters the questions about the rod and bowl, there is no clear reference to sexuality and certainly no allusion to Comus. Tiriel's concern with his old age and mortality echoes Ecclesiastes: "before the silver cord is snapped, or the golden bowl is broken" (12:6). But there are significant differences. Cord is replaced by rod, and neither wisdom nor love is associated with these objects in Ecclesiastes. Originally a single line, "Can wisdom be put in a silver rod or love in a golden bowl" (deleted from Tiriel 8, E 815), these questions occur in Tiriel's final venting of rage against his father. The anger expressed by Tiriel against power supported by a hypocritical religion is a familiar theme in Blake's work. Here Tiriel questions the universalizing myth of "Thy God of love thy heaven of joy" (del., E 815) invoked by a natural religion which turns Tiriel into a serpent. As a child, Tiriel claims that he was not given nourishment and milk by his mother, and that his father scourged him into weak infant sorrow. This treatment bred hypocrisy—"the idiots wisdom & the wise mans folly" (del., E 815). Elizabeth Stieg identifies Tiriel as a false prophet, "one who speaks in God's name to tyrannize over others" (296). Tiriel is brought to that hypocritical and limiting religion which Blake elsewhere identifies as feminine: "Compelst to pray repugnant & to humble the immortal spirit / Till I am subtil as a serpent in paradise" (8.23-24, E